1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the fields of pharmacology and medicine. More specifically, the present invention relates to isolated polypeptides and polynucleotides derived from organisms of the genus Bordetella that have been identified and cloned as being able to elicit immune response in a mammalian host. 2. Description of the Related Art Bordetella pertussis is the causative agent of whooping cough (pertussis) in humans. Among other effects, pertussis toxin (PT) has been shown to contribute to the pathogenesis of this disease (1). Intracellularly, PT is believed to cause its cellular and behavioral effects by modulating the cellular function of host cells. PT has been shown to promote the adhesion of the bacteria to macrophages and to increase the phagocytosis of these cells by the bacterium (2). In addition, PT can alter the mitogenic activity of cytokines and modulate lymphocyte proliferation (3). Thus, pertussis toxin appears to have pleiotropic effects on the cells of the human host. PT has been classified into two types, PT1 and PT2. PT1, derived from the organism B. pertussis, has been demonstrated to bind to human and rodent cells and has been shown to trigger the human histamine release reaction (4,5). PT2 has been purified from the organism B. paraptussis (6) and the organism B. bronchiseptica (7) and has also been demonstrated to bind to human and rodent cells and to elicit histamine release (5).

Furthermore, it is believed that PT2 may be a subunit of the larger molecule PT1 (6). The B. pertussis and B. paraptussis organisms are believed to exist as a complex of three antigens in their respective virulent and avirulent forms. These antigens include the virulence factors, filamentous hemagglutinin, pertussis toxin and the acellular vaccine (8-12). The acellular vaccine is a preparation of the above three antigens and has been
