The Ford Motor Company used Scanmaster-ELM for many years to test many Ford models. The first significant defect was found in 1983, it was then found in many Ford vehicles. It was also found in other foreign vehicles imported to the United States, particularly those from General Motors, but its cause was not found. The Ford Scanmaster-ELM diagnostic tool was used to test the Explorer and Escort. It was also discovered that cars were being inspected with the incorrect model year. For example, cars from the wrong model year that were testing in certain provinces were being . In Canada, the application was used. Some of the findings were that the search engine was about 20% slower than the application. Various other findings were the . The Scanmaster-ELM test required a special test procedure. It consisted of checking the number of pre-charged engine cylinders as well as the fuel mixture in all of them. This was done in a very short time. After that, the spark advance settings were checked, as was the timing on carburetors. The air flow meter was set to two different speeds, one to check the speed of the air flow meter, and one to check the engine speed. Then, the ignition settings were checked. The oxygen sensor settings were checked. The exhaust system was checked to make sure that all of the components are working properly. The . In 1986, the scanmaster-ELM in Canada was called Scan-Master-ELM and the software was not updated to eliminate these problems. As a result, many foreign vehicles were banned by the Canadian government from entry to Canada. These vehicles were recalled. Many differences were found between the "overseas" versions of the Ford Scanmaster-ELM and the "back-to-USA" versions. A new version was needed for the United States. It was called ScanMaster-ELM. In 1988, the problems with the Scanmaster-ELM test in Canada was published in a research paper called "Scanmaster-ELM: A Prototype Program to Identify Emission System Control" which was authored by a team of Canadian engineers. It is a seminal paper because it reports the first recorded use of a computer diagnostic program to identify a serious manufacturing or service defect in a product that potentially can affect the health of people.
