Carpenter Workmen Carpenter work is done by a range of workers. Those who do this type of work are generally classed as carpenters. Classification Carpenters of the past were given a classification of their work by the government. For example, carpenters were classified by the government as: Plastic Trades Workers Classification Plastic Trades Workers Classifications were used for this classification from the 1950s to the late 1990s. This classification also included the making of wooden carvings (norman carvers) and general hand building trade workers. Those in the making of wooden carvings may not have been carpenters if making carvings for a living but working with wood on a workshop would have made them carpenters, as would have those making from the wood. Advantages of the Classification Its advantages included the fact that the skilled men were given more money than unskilled workers and the unskilled workers were given extra help with their work and training. It was an evidence based type of classification for the government. Disadvantages of the Classification The classification was abolished in 1999 as part of a government review of all occupations. The main reason for this was that this classification was created from 1950 to 1974. At the time of this classification, there was still conflict between the trade union movement and other workers in the movement at the time who protested against the unions using their old skills. Some of these workers were the most skilled of the era and this was why they were given the classification. However, these workers did not get the special training and support for their work as it should have been. Advantages of the Grouping As a result of this review, the classification of carpenters was abolished and the groupings or 'classes' were re-constituted. These classes were 'Framework Workers, Carriage and Container Maker, N.C
