Ten of the 20 boxes of state materials discovered in the Canberra home of retired Navy officer Harry Dunn don't have serial numbers, raising concerns the items could be stolen. The discovery of the boxes, which contained keys, flat batteries and tools, at the home of Harry Dunn and Millie Dunn-Dunn has sparked interest from around the country. The owner of a storage facility where some of the goods were discovered said they looked "tidy" and "almost professional", but that they were not likely to belong to a major business. "I don't know why anybody would be handing items like this out in a box," the owner, who did not want to be identified, told the ABC. "There's no registration, there's no serial numbers, they're not box contents. It's not like this place is a random place where people dump things." The storage place, located in the Sydney suburb of Gordon, which had been in operation for years, said it had been contacted by police and will keep the items until notified otherwise. "It's hard to say, you know, if they're leaving something, that's how they want it to look," the owner said. "If they're getting rid of things they're certainly putting them in a box." The owner said he had never seen boxes like this before and that the items found were "not very large". "They don't look like a bomb disposal kit, they don't look like a build kit or anything like that," he said. "A lot of tools, seems like they want to be hidden or at least they don't want to be seen." The ABC has spoken to two separate people who attended the storage facility to pick up similar boxes, one of whom described the items as "a bit curious". The other person said they were surprised to find the boxes in Australia. "This is Australia, the boxes are quite unusual for someone to ship to Australia, I don't know," the second person said. "In the recycling box there was some electronics, there was some metal bits, bits of glass." The ABC has also been told that three of the items — a bottle opener, a hammer and a screwdriver — were found on
