The Communications Authority's John Whelan says he expects new and existing services in Sydney, Melbourne and Brisbane will be upgraded to a 4G network before May. Carriers Vodafone and Optus also said that both the hybrid and 4G networks had reached Australian shores. This required access to the National Broadband Network to upgrade to the new network. Vodafone and Optus said they did not have any details on when the 4G network would be available to their customers. 2 hours ago. Telstra chairman and chief executive officer David Thodey and federal communications minister Senator Stephen Conroy announce the 4G network will go live in May. 2 hours ago. Telecom's CTO Craig Prater says that companies and individuals would see some changes to their mobile internet plans before the upgrade, such as faster downloads. "But we do not plan to break any customer contracts." 12 hours ago. Telstra Group chief executive officer David Thodey says the 4G network is expected to be a game changer. "This is the first time a fixed wireless broadband network will be able to provide faster mobile speeds that compete with satellite." 2 hours ago. Thodey says the 4G network would provide an alternative to mobile networks that don't provide 4G service. "This will provide customers with real world performance to support the explosion of mobile traffic that is expected in the future." 2 hours ago.
