I have been working with this developer for several years and as far as I know he has never made a mistake. He is like a machine and it is very annoying as I have to take care of all the issues he has. We mostly work in Asp.Net MVC, but there are many issues and the problems are very complex. He just doesn't seem to understand the issues and often makes mistakes which will make me think twice on the code. For example he will just delete the entire Controller or Model, or delete all the references. The other time he will completely misspell something and change it to a completely different word. The developer almost works in isolation. He doesn't consult me at all even if I make a mistake, and he says nothing about it. I am sure if I had someone like this I would be very annoyed with them as well. A: I think you are over-reacting here. The developer is making mistakes, it's just part of the process. The fact that you're having to spend time trying to keep the problem from propagating means the product is complex enough that the developer simply can't be effective. I think the developer needs to be reminded of the reality that they can only work so fast. But if you're over-reacting to the occasional mis-step by somebody who is inexperienced, you're missing the point: no matter how experienced the developer is, they aren't infallible. In fact, if you have someone who doesn't make mistakes, you are more likely to make a mistake, simply because you're not used to that way of thinking. I would suggest that you give the developer the benefit of the doubt for a while, just so they can get a feel for their mistakes. Maybe you can take a break from the project for a day or two. Then have the developer tell you what they think they did wrong, and how they think it can be avoided. Even if you think the problem is mostly your own fault, you may be able to find a way to make the process better. A: Actually, this is very 2d92ce491b
