In a previous 6-week study (Sahlgren M, Thorens B, Norring U. Drug therapy in general practice. Scand J Psych Nerv Syr. 1985; 6: 385-389.), we found that a combination of nortriptyline and clomipramine was better than nortriptyline alone in general practice for the treatment of depressions. In this open-label study, we have examined this combination treatment as a long-term antidepressant treatment. Seven hundred and forty-five patients with major depression received nortriptyline or nortriptyline and clomipramine (mean doses +/- s.d. were 162.4 +/- 75.9 and 10.1 +/- 6.9 mg, respectively). The treatment was continued for 6 months. Efficacy was evaluated by using the Hamilton Depression Scale (HAMD), Clinical Global Impression (CGI), and a 7-point global improvement scale. The response rate was 65.3% at the end of 6 months. According to the HAMD scores, there was a significant improvement in the reduction of symptoms during 6 months in both nortriptyline and nortriptyline and clomipramine groups. This improvement was not associated with changes in the HAMD scores during 6 months in the two groups. The clomipramine group showed a significantly higher score on the CGI-Improvement scale. There was no significant difference in CGI-Severity scale scores at any time point between the two groups. About 25% of the patients discontinued the treatment due to side effects. As a long-term treatment, nortriptyline and clomipramine treatment was effective and well tolerated in general practice, with some mild side effects.
