The subject matter disclosed herein relates to an electronic module and, more particularly, to a connector on the electronic module for facilitating the mechanical securing of the electronic module to a component housing. Component housings, such as a cabinet or the like, can be arranged to receive one or more electronic modules. For example, a data center cabinet can include multiple shelves or drawers in which electronic modules are located. The electronic modules may provide a variety of functions, such as power distribution, communications, switching, and the like, and can be incorporated in server, storage, switch, and other types of electronic systems. Electronic modules are generally very densely populated within their component housings to conserve space. Electronic modules are often coupled to or integrated into component housings using a number of fasteners that are inserted into the housing, for example, by threading through an opening in the housing. In these arrangements, the electronic modules are often fastened to a component housing by inserting fasteners through an opening in the electronic module and into an opening in the component housing. As can be appreciated, the electronic modules may be made of different materials and/or have different shapes and may be configured to include different amounts of surface area for receiving fasteners. This can make it difficult to properly position the electronic module with respect to the component housing to facilitate insertion of the fasteners. Additionally, if the electronic module is very densely populated with components, it may be difficult to insert the fasteners through the electronic module and into the component housing.

Q: Why is the complex conjugate of  $n \cdot \frac{1}{z^n}$  equal to  $\frac{1}{n \cdot z^{n-1}}$ ? For every  $z \in \mathbb{C}$ ,  $\bar{z} = \frac{z}{\overline{z}}$  and, by the definition of the complex conjugate,  $\bar{n \cdot \frac{1}{z^n}} = \frac{1}{\overline{z^n}}$
