In November 1997, Scali and a partner, Paul Murphy, created the first Level D aircraft for FSX/P3D, and Â published the original Level D manual, which details the aircraft's features and performance. At this time, the flight simulator, FMX, was released, which included a 3-D trainer and the planes and helos were based on this program. The first Level D was the HeloHawk. This aircraft had only six of its parts: the cockpit, pylon, landing gear, main gear, rotor blades, and tail rotors. The first of the other parts of the aircraft were created and first written for Level D, and they were first used on the HeloHawk. In addition to the 30 or so craft and components, the Level D manual included information on aircraft construction, maintenance and alteration, and electronic communications. It was produced as a subscription-based electronic manual available on CD-ROM and on the Internet. In March 2000, the Level D Developer Group was formed by six of the leading FSX/P3D pilots to market, market test, and develop the aircraft as a series of downloadable demo aircraft components. This consortium of pilots has brought forth the Level D system, which consists of a number of aircraft design and simulation programs. Similar to Level D, the Flight Design E-flight 3D series contains a flight simulation program, which is used to train aspiring military and civilian pilots and tradesmen. This flight simulation program is available on the CD-ROM disk or in electronic format. Level D was introduced in 2003.
