This application is the first competitive renewal of an R01 (AG20001) that has enabled us to gain a unique, general understanding of the biologic underpinnings of multiple aspects of the human Chagas disease cycle, including Chagasic heart disease. It has permitted us to examine the association of TGF-Beta and Chagas disease outcomes in the human and to elucidate the molecular mechanisms that underlie the progression of heart tissue fibrosis to the heart failure that is the hallmark of Chagas cardiomyopathy. These studies have defined novel molecular mechanisms and led to new avenues for drug development for patients with Chagas cardiomyopathy. We now propose to extend the studies in Aim 1 to examine the effect of Chagas cardiomyopathy on gastrointestinal smooth muscle cells and to determine how they contribute to the pathogenesis of Chagas cardiomyopathy. These studies are proposed to begin with the development of Chagas disease induced neuro-myopathy, which will also be examined for evidence of the effect of neuro- myopathy on the Chagas disease cycle by examining the difference in response between neural and skeletal muscle cells to TGF-Beta (Aim 2). These studies will be followed by the development of a model of Chagas cardiomyopathy in the mouse (Aim 3). These models will be used to determine the impact of mTOR signaling on the pathology of heart tissue fibrosis. At the conclusion of the R03 phase, we will have examined the effect of Chagas cardiomyopathy 3e33713323
