started it pulls all the needed files from a tar.gz. The issue I have is that the tar.gz file can have different paths depending on the environment variables of the user who is going to run the docker-compose file. For example my path is something like: C:\Users\User\Desktop\Working Folder\Docker Projects\ProjectA\ where ProjectA is the folder that contains my docker-compose file and the dockerfile that build the image. But I need to pull that image from another dockerfile in a container that is inside the same docker-compose file and have a similar path. For example I have another dockerfile that builds the image and I want to pull that image from:

C:\Users\User\Desktop\Working Folder\Docker Projects\ProjectB\ so I need to do something like: export PROJECTA=$(pwd) export PROJECTB=$(pwd) In the docker-compose file. The problem is that when I do that docker says the PROJECTB environment variable is not defined and when I define it in the docker-compose file it says that the PROJECTA environment variable is not defined. Is there a way to do that? A: export should be used to set environment variables in shell processes, not docker-compose. Try the command below in the shell before starting docker-compose: $ export PROJECTA=$(pwd) $ export PROJECTB=$(pwd) Also, be careful with the use of pwd. See here, and here, and here for more
