Oriental selectivity of an amantadine-resistant mutation in the mitochondrial protein Cox3 of Neurospora crassa. Dramatic selectivity effects on the in vivo biogenesis of subunit I of mitochondrial complex III have been found when amantadine, a compound that can inhibit cytochrome oxidase, has been added to cultures of mitochondria-deficient Neurospora crassa strain IMU14. A mutant of this strain, called IMU-14A, was found to be resistant to the toxic effects of amantadine. The amantadine-

resistant mutant was produced by selecting and cloning IMU-14A away from a wild-type culture of strain IMU14. (Amantadine-sensitivity was restored in the cloned mutant and the cells reverted to the amantadine-sensitive state following inactivation of the IMU14A mitochondrial genome with hydrazine.) By electron microscopy it was seen that the resistance of IMU14A to amantadine could be fully accounted for by the absence of the 23-kDa subunit I of complex III in membrane preparations of the mutant strain. When complex III assembly intermediates were examined by cross-linking the assembly intermediates in a similar mitochondrial membrane preparation from IMU14A with two different bifunctional reagents, several cross-linked complexes, some of which were thought to represent assembled complex III, were isolated and characterized by differential detergent and phospholipase treatments. One of these complexes, called complex III(a)(x), was particularly striking because its 23-kDa subunit I was found to be joined to its 49-kDa subunit
