Getting the 411 on documents: The most commonly used document format in Photoshop is layered PSD. Photoshop's native format is not XML. However, Photoshop, a Windows program, can open and save XPS files, Adobe's proprietary XML-based document format. A Photoshop document includes a wide variety of layers, which enable you to create multiple images in one document. An image can have as many as 125 layers, though more than 90 layers is unusual. A `_layer_` is a collection of pixels, color, or type that you can move within an image as you edit it. Many layers represent an image or graphic on a page, such as a text block, a shape, or the background. You can create a new layer by selecting Layers from the Layers menu. Getting the 411 on documents:

`_Layered files are great for creating artwork, but you can't see an image's image until you put it on the background, unless you use a different program for this task. In most programs, layers are not a way to create different images. In Photoshop, a layer is a collection of pixels that you can move to different places in an image without affecting the original. Layers allow you to change the appearance of an image without replacing the original. Using the Layers panel, you can create a new layer to change the appearance of an existing or new layer. Because layers are part of an image, you can also select a new layer from the Layers menu when you need to manipulate a new image. Layers let you to change an image's appearance without affecting the layers that make up that image. Some people call layers an image's "skin."_ To create a new layer: In the Layers panel, click New on the Layers panel menu. A dialog box opens. Select the Type of Layer you want to create and then click OK. Your new layer appears in the Layers panel. You can move your new layer to a new position in the image. To do so, click and drag the new layer in the Layers panel to a different spot in the image. When you place a new layer, Photoshop opens the Color Picker tool (the color-selection box with squares on its corners) to help you choose the new color for the layer. You can create a new layer and change its color and type when a new image is open. To do so, open a file using any program, such as Adobe`

Although it was not designed to be the "beginner's Photoshop" that most of us knew, it does have an intuitive user interface and a set of editing tools that get out of the way and allow you to focus on creating. You can create and manipulate images, modify them, and then save or print them in different ways. And just like with more advanced versions of Photoshop, you'll learn how to use the tools, and you'll be able to quickly perform your editing tasks. While in Elements it is possible to achieve the same level of image creation, editing and manipulation of a professional photographer, the learning curve is a bit steeper. That said, it's easy to get a grasp of what works and what doesn't. There are many helpful tutorials that can get you going quickly. While Elements should be accessible to anyone, we've put together a list of tutorials that will get you familiar with the basics of the program's most important features. This article also goes over some essential prerequisites to get you started with Photoshop Elements. 1. What Are the Photoshop Elements Editor's Features? The Photoshop Elements editor is a fully featured image manipulation software that allows you to edit images with tools like crop, clone, gradient, reverse, blur, and resize. You can also create new images from scratch with built-in Photoshop's basic tools like copy, paste, and transform. And with its inbuilt library, you can add effects, frames, and other text to your images. When you're done, you can save and print your work. Elements is very versatile in its capabilities, and can be used for a variety of purposes, especially those that require image processing. It is the classic, all-round tool for all graphic editing tasks. Whether you're a photographer, graphic designer, web designer or just a person who likes to play with pictures, you will definitely benefit from Elements. You can create your own or edit other images with one click. As a result, you can take full control of your work. Additionally, you can enhance your images with dozens of filters, frames, and backgrounds. You can also use Elements to accomplish other tasks, like image resizing and optimization. With it, you can even combine your work with other Adobe Creative Cloud apps like Photoshop and InDesign. In terms of the user interface, Elements shares the same basic layout with Photoshop. There are three main windows, although there 8ce3bd8656

Q: RxJava switchMap/flatMap produces duplicate subscriber I have an observable like so: `public static Observable something() { return Observable.just("something"); }` I want to map it to: `public static Observable map(Function> f) { return Observable.from(f.apply(f.apply("something"))); }` and then flatMap it `public static Observable flatMap(Function> mapper) { return Observable.combineLatest(Observable.from(mapper.apply(value))); }` so I have: `public static Observable makeApiCall(String method, T value) { return something().flatMap(makeAPIMap).flatMap(json -> /* CAST JSON OBJECT TO DTO /); }` `public static Observable makeAPIMap(String method, T value) { return Observable.just(mapper(method, value)); }` I thought I could be doing something silly, but the combination of the two methods seems to behave as a single subscriber-per-value, i.e. the output is: `Something {something=1} Something {something=2} Something {something=1} Something {something=2} Something {something=1}` If I were to avoid the combinatorial code via the `makeAPIMap` function, the subscription order would be: `makeApiCall(method, value).flatMap(this::makeAPIMap).flatMap(json -> / CAST JSON OBJECT TO DTO /);` Anyone have any idea why the combinatorial operator is outputting duplicate subscribers? A: I think your `flatMap(json -> / CAST JSON OBJECT TO DTO */) clause is`

Seven wonderful days without headphones and nice music. Oh, and the best European airport WiFi. The plane was short on time so two people shared one bed, an armchair, and one laptop (computer, that is). We used this computer for entertainment and for email, Facebook, and blogging. Our flight arrived at 9:30am in Vienna. Before reaching the baggage claim, we were each in a different baggage terminal, with different check in and customs procedures, in an airport in which we knew nobody. The only person we knew was the Austrian family (two parents, a little boy, and an older girl) that accompanied us to the taxi stand. I was a little anxious, since we were coming from the Netherlands and had not had many hours of sleep during the transit time, so I almost immediately asked the dad for a little box of coke for me. He offered to get me some water instead. He did, but I needed coke. I had just come from the Netherlands, after all. He got me some coke. The taxi ride to the hotel was very short. My friend, Jeffrey, looked me in the eyes and said, "There are no words for how beautiful you look, right now." He was right. The most difficult parts of our trip were pre-trip logistics (which is always the case), so I was happy to start with a nice compliment. A little too loud, perhaps, but he is far from my type. :) Our hotel room was very nice, though we had to share it with several others. The bathroom looked similar to the one in the photos with the tap, a sink, and a toilet. Oh, and a mirror in the ceiling. If anyone wants to take a day trip to Vienna, then I recommend it. Hotel rooms are a steal. It was a Monday night, so we had a quiet room. On this morning, we could hear the radio, but it was in German. On Thursday and Friday, we spent the day exploring Vienna. We bought some tourist maps and decided that the best way to see all of Vienna is by foot. After lunch, Jeffrey and I bought some coffee, and then we took some time to look around. Vienna is extremely beautiful. The architecture is incredible. There were city residents out and about, but they were a little reserved. We decided we would wait for the locals to do some studying and socializing before we did. Friday, we went to the
