Note 3-D design tools have long been associated with the printer business. The first 3-D printers to hit the scene did not just print photos. Rather, they printed physical objects built using computer-aided design (CAD) systems. Today, 3-D printing has exploded in popularity, and the printers can be found at discount stores and office supply stores. However, a few other software programs are related to 3-D printing. In particular, some CAD programs can produce 2-D layers that make a 3-D shape.

What's New In?

Insect control using pesticides is an age-old practice. Insecticides are used in a variety of household and professional settings to eliminate the destructive impact of these pests on the household and equipment. More often than not, insecticides are applied to selected areas of the house or equipment as an effective means of control. One of the difficulties in targeting a specific area of the house or equipment with an insecticide is the presence of a sealed surface that restricts the insecticide from traveling into the area. For example, it may be desired to kill insects that live in or near a crawlspace of the house. These insects will often live on an exterior surface, such as the bottom of the siding, which is generally not accessible except through openings in the siding. Thus, it can be difficult to access these insects with insecticides. Fumigation and fogging is a common practice for killing or reducing the population of insects. Most commonly, fumigation involves the use of toxic gases, while fogging involves the use of aerosol sprays or atomized drops. Both techniques typically apply only to a small area and are often not very effective. Generally, fogging and fumigation techniques are most effective when the insecticide is introduced into an area while the insects are in flight. Once the insecticide particles land, they can easily be ingested by the insects, thereby reducing the efficiency of the fumigation or fogging technique. Another difficulty with conventional insecticide application techniques is that the insecticides often have unpleasant odors that can travel to various locations in the house or equipment. Often, the odors can be trapped in certain locations, such as crawlspaces, where the odors can continue to dissipate, or the odors can seep into a sealed area that is difficult to access or reach. These odors can be uncomfortable, possibly having a negative impact on the people living or working in the vicinity of the exposed area. As a result, pesticide application techniques often depend on the use of special care and maintenance routines or schedules to reduce the odors associated with the application. The present invention provides insecticides that can selectively coat a targeted area without an initial aerosol or fogging spray being present. As a result, most or all of the insecticide is delivered to the targeted area and not wasted on the larger area surrounding the targeted area. The insecticide is preferably a gas that can be diffused into the targeted area for maximum effect. The present invention provides a number of gas delivery systems that are easy
