Q: Using ROC curve to classify disease I am not very familiar with ROC analysis. Could someone explain to me whether I can use ROC curve analysis to classify disease? In my case, my dataset is like this: a b c d 1 8.5 5.2 0.3735083 2 5.6 4.9 0.3629004 3 2.2 5.3 0.3411908 4 6.6 4.7 0.3378336 5 8.1 6.1 0.3364817 6 7.2 6.2 0.3382703 "a" means disease condition, "b" means healthy condition. I want to know the probability of if a particular subject is diseased or healthy. I am using tree-based learner to build a classifier, ROC analysis is helpful, right? I want to do such a task since I am working on high-dimensional sparse data, the best way for me to classify is to use tree-based learner. What about ROC curve analysis? Is it applicable in my task? A: In your case, the curves are displayed by simply plotting $(0,1)$ and $(1,0)$ and leaving the x-axis on the top, see e.g. the example in?roc This is not as applicable to ROC curve analysis as it might seem, since you can only count a disease or not. A lot of things in your data may influence the decision. A little more generally, yes, ROC curve analysis is used to explore the performance of a model. You can e.g. consider it as a performance measure, while it can be interpreted as a way to visualize the trade-off between the true positive rate and the false positive rate. Learning Haskell from Prolog (2010) - stablemap ===== thanatos_dem I've been doing prolog for a bit, and felt like this is a fairly good primer. For more recent info, I'd definitely recommend David C. Dobson's "Prolog Programming: the Art of Data Flow" and the related "Propositional Logic". Also, I can vouch that I
