The purpose of this article is to describe a problem I encountered with internet providers and the process of getting the Wi-Fi that the ISP provided me fixed. It was a really challenging and frustrating experience getting this situation resolved. I hope I can use this post as a reference for those who might run into the same issue, or just generally improve their services. I started experiencing some minor issues with my internet connection at home, mainly, random web pages would open about 10-15 times a day and then eventually block me for a few hours or even a day at a time. If that was not bad enough, I ended up not being able to access the "tray" to make calls, to send messages, etc. The fix was most likely that one of the IP addresses assigned to the router was getting reallocated to someone else. I saw a similar problem and eventually fixed it by swapping out the router with a new one. What's the fix? The fix seems to come down to changing the IP address of the router. I believe that internet providers will start by slowly reallocating addresses from your computer to other devices. If that's not the case, this a problem a lot of people have faced and it might be a quick fix (just have to login to the router and change the settings). If you think you're facing this problem or want to learn a bit more about it, keep reading. Problem encountered Firstly, I'd like to describe to you the problems I encountered. The first problem was that the problem was affecting Wi-Fi. I had a MacBook Pro (late 2016), and the only connection I had was via a Wi-Fi router, sometimes around 15 packets (for about 5 minutes) would get dropped, sometimes a lot of them
