A spokesman for House Judiciary Committee Chairman Jerry Nadler, D-N.Y., said Wednesday that Nadler is still working to determine whether to issue subpoenas. Democrats are looking to have the special counsel, Robert Mueller, testify before Congress in early 2019. But the spokesman said the subpoena wasn't the only reason that the committee is calling the president's private attorney. "They're calling first because they have additional questions on the firing of [former FBI Director James] Comey," he said. "Not just about the President's private views on what he said. But also on private discussions among the White House, and on how the President reacted to Comey's firing." The spokesman explained that during the panel's meeting, the committee leaders discussed the FBI's surveillance of a former Trump campaign adviser and possible Russian contacts involving former national security adviser Michael Flynn. "The Chairman said that he hopes the President's private views are not criminal," the spokesperson said. "He said he would think that we would have no objection if the President gave us to understand that the firing of [Comey] was ultimately, well, a mistake." Nadler was referring to the July 2, 2017 conversation that Trump had with the former FBI director, when he said he had done nothing wrong in firing him. During that discussion, Trump also said that he had the Comey firing in mind when he decided to cancel Comey's July 4th trip. During the meeting, according to a transcript of the discussion, Nadler also asked if Trump believed any discussions of Russia's election meddling or collusion with his campaign should be off-limits for Mueller to investigate. "I think it's actually better if that happened," Nadler said, when Trump said the special counsel should be able to investigate everything. "He fired him because of Russia. Right?" Trump said at the time. The White House says Trump never asked Comey to drop the investigation into Flynn, and the President's statement of the case says Trump fired Comey for "the Russia investigation alone." Nadler did not answer that question, according to a Democratic aide, but asked if Trump thought the Russia probe should be a priority. The Democratic aide added that Nadler had some preliminary research on the topic

There can be no doubt that the novel is a social commentary on the way in which men - and not just Indian men - treat women in our society. Harish and Dr. Mishra are both dressed in modern clothing which is a stark contrast to the old traditional getup worn by most men in India. This could be because of the gender bias that is prevalent in our society that prevents a woman from wearing any modern attire even though she has a male doctor. This idea is suggested in the novel in the way that the two men treat Dr. Mishra, who is clearly an older woman, by assuming that she is helpless and naive. This attitude is not only prevalent amongst uneducated men, but is also prevalent in the educated men that Dr. Mishra has to deal with on a day-to-day basis. The novel questions society's perception of womanhood and what it means to be a man. It is apparent that the reaction to the novel in the Indian media is also reflective of how the male population treats women. Most articles criticizing the novel were written by men, and the authors refused to even concede that the novel had a social message. One of the reasons they may have failed to understand the significance of the novel is because they had been brought up in different parts of the country and studied in different schools. It can be assumed that most of the people who commented on the novel felt the title was sexist, because it was written from the perspective of a man. While the title clearly denotes that the novel is written from a man's viewpoint, it should be noted that the term "Modern Girl" is not used, and it is obvious that the novel is written from the perspective of a male narrator. It can be argued that since in the Indian culture, the term modern girl carries a negative connotation, a better title for this novel would have been "The Negative Perception of the Modern Girl." It must be noted that the novel does not speak of any one particular girl as modern or traditional, and it is obvious that the title is very general in terms of its scope. This is evident when the schoolboy Kasam says that after studying life in modern schools and universities, he no longer thinks that certain girls are modern. This belief is prevalent amongst an educated middle class society and is far from being the perception of most working-class and lower-class Indians. It is evident from most articles criticizing the novel that most respondents to the survey were from higher middle-
