Motion capture is a technology used by game developers and animation studios that allows them to create a virtual recreation of a player's movements and create a very realistic, high definition experience. By using motion capture technology, game developers can create perfectly believable, high definition player models and animations within the game engine, which are extremely realistic compared to conventional methods. A notable game which uses motion capture is the sports game Madden NFL 2005, which was based on the Sony PlayStation 2. It was released in 2005 and features a very high definition visual, motion blur, and parallax effect on the player models to give the game a more lifelike feel. The motion capture technology was also used for the game's animations, allowing the player models to act out moments from the game that resemble the real-life play. "We're really excited to have developed a game that will use the same Motion Capture technology that has evolved into a big industry," EA CFO Blake Jorgensen said, "We look forward to seeing what the fan reaction is to this next generation of FIFA gameplay." FIFA 20 is the 13th game in the long-running football series, and has a much more realistic style of play compared to previous FIFA titles. This year's game features Retake, a brand new gameplay mode which allows the player to rewind and replay a missed chance or a saved throw-in, by pressing the L2 and R2 buttons. The idea behind Retake is to help players improve their passing accuracy, shooting and throwing accuracy. FIFA 21 was released in September 2015 and was the first FIFA game developed and released by Electronic Arts for the Xbox One and PlayStation 4, as well as the first EA sports game released on a next-generation console. FIFA 19 was released in September 2018. The new MyCareer Mode is the next evolution of the My Career Mode from FIFA 18. It features a new match engine and gameplay, player progression, career mode, and online play. The new mode also features improved AI for the other team, online matchmaking, and a faster online experience. EA SPORTS FIFA 19 is scheduled to be released worldwide this September 2019.
