Hemangioblastomas (HB) are benign, vascular, and locally aggressive neoplasms that arise from glial tissue of the spinal cord or spinal leptomeninges. Complete surgical resection is the most effective way to treat this disease. However, there are certain anatomic and/or surgical limitations due to the tumor's size, its proximity to the vital structures, or its intramedullary location. For these reasons, neurosurgical treatment is necessary for successful outcomes. We report a case of a 9-year-old boy who underwent endoscopic exploration and guided enucleation of HB of the spinal cord. In this technique, a 14-gauge spinal needle was used to puncture the tumor, and the tract was irrigated by an endoscopic guide wire, which was then used to guide a cannula. This technique allows for accurate tumor localization, decreased operative time, more extensive resection of the tumor, and decreased risk of pseudo-operculum formation.Q: How can I change the runlevel used by Ubuntu in order to boot properly I'm trying to change the runlevel used by my machine to boot. I've heard that you can do this with GRUB2, but I have no idea how, so I'm hoping there's another way. A: GRUB2 doesn't do this (at least not by default). However, if you tell your BIOS to boot from your first hard drive (or partition, as it will probably just show up as one single drive as a whole) then you can just use the file /etc/rc.local to start your services at the desired runlevel and shutdown the computer. Try typing on your keyboard Control+Alt+F3 when the screen goes black and you see the kernel messages. Or instead of typing you can press a key after a while (just be aware you may need to reboot a
