Q: Hard drive cleaning Is there a way to remove all of the dust and debris from an old hard drive and clean it up to be functional? A: Gently wiping a hard drive with isopropyl alcohol can remove dust and grime from the drive. I'd recommend to do this outside on a cold, rainy day and when you're finished with that be sure to blow it dry off. Alcohol can be corrosive to your computer hardware so make sure to use a safe solvent such as rubbing alcohol or denatured alcohol. You can also use acetone or turpentine if you have it or use denatured alcohol and a spray bottle to direct the vapors. It is also important to wipe the drive with a tacky cloth such as an old towel or napkin that won't provide any static charge to the drive. Be sure to cover the drive and place it on a clean and flat surface to prevent it from moving. You're invited to this fun night of a movie and some wine! Risk factors for thromboembolic complications during childbirth in a tertiary maternity hospital in South Africa. This prospective observational study was conducted to determine the risk factors for thromboembolic complications during childbirth in a tertiary maternity hospital in South Africa. During the study period, 591 women who delivered at the hospital were recruited; 91 (15.3%) had thromboembolic complications. The mean ages of women with and without thromboembolic complications were 30.6 +/- 5.5 and 29.8 +/- 5.8 years ( $P = 0.303$ ), respectively. Women with thromboembolic complications were more likely to be of black ethnicity ( $P = 0.038$ ) and to have developed advanced maternal age ( $P = 0.022$ ). Pregnancy and labour resulted in almost a 30% increase in the odds of developing a thromboembolic complication. However, length of labour and oxytocin augmentation did not have a significant impact on thromboembolic complications. In the event of a thromboembolic complication, blood tests revealed the presence of D-dimer in 36.5% (35/97) of women. Calf prophylaxis was initiated in only 48.4% (47/96) of women with thromboembolic complications. Thromboembolic complications are common in South African women, occurring in 15.3% of women during childbirth. A distinct difference existed in the risk of thromboembolic complications according to ethnicity. Although self-perceived obstetric risk may be associated with such complications, prophylactic measures are not instituted in most women in routine clinical practice. to find out where you put the bullet? GAVIN: I hear it was in a hole. HOHESSCHENKEL: Yes, it was in a hole. "It's about Jesus Christ, and He's just a regular guy," said St. Joseph High School senior Evan Cain, 16, of how the church's worship is different than the other churches he has attended. "It's not like more organized or anything," he said. "When we sing, everybody just kind of joins in the chorus." Cain also said that he believes that God is more involved than at other churches he has visited. "I think God has a bigger role," he said.
